

OPTION A

EASY ANONYMITY: CURSE OF THE INTERNET

1 Wanting your voice to be heard is an almost universal desire. For generations we had the village pub, the pamphlet, the letters page. Politicians, clerics, commentators, critics, technical experts aired their views more formally and widely, but we knew who said what. So, we judged
5 them accordingly, whether as interesting thinkers, fools or malicious bastards. Then came the Internet and everyone could have a say with a chance that the world might agree. Unfortunately, it also became easier to hide from the safety of darkness, or to invent any number of imaginary enthusiasts to shower praise on your book or business. So, the Times report
10 about TripAdvisor was unsurprising. This lucrative US website, where customers review hotels and restaurants worldwide and contribute to their rankings, has been found to have many fake reviews. Some suspicious companies offer to post five-star verdicts and some malicious negative reviews are being sold in order to damage rivals. One remedy should be to 15 forbid anonymity: at least your name should be given to the host, who should be able to contact you. Easy anonymity for noisy opinions is the curse of the Internet age. Hiding your identity is not admirable, at least not if you're going to join arguments. Hate me if you like, but tell me who you are! Let's engage as humans, not robots! Once you join an argument rather 20 than asking a question, it is only decent to stand up.

OPTION B

CAN ULTIMATE FRISBEE SAVE THE WORLD?

1 They'd gathered for supper one night in July, at the summer camp at the Kfar Silver School, in Ashkelon, Israel. For the last couple of weeks this group of kids — some from Israel, some from Palestine — had been trying to learn something about conflict resolution, by playing Ultimate Frisbee.

5 Some of them had become friends. That was when the air raid siren went off. The rockets came from Gaza. The missiles didn't land in Ashkelon. But they did score a direct hit on the hopes of the people who saw the camp as an oasis of peace.

When I interviewed David Barkan, director of the camp, and he described
10 his hope of changing hearts and minds through Ultimate Frisbee, I struggled to imagine how Frisbee - seriously, Frisbee? - might succeed where a half-century of diplomacy had failed. Ultimate Frisbee has something unique: There's no referee. The sport is self-regulated by its players, and when there's a dispute, they come to an agreement. If the conflict can't be 15 resolved, the match starts over. But most of the time, the players work it out together.

Jews and Palestinians who've been part of this project have begun to see each other in new ways, with empathy for people they used to consider enemies. As for that missile attack, the camp received over 300 calls from 20 worried parents. But not one child left the camp that night. Instead, when the all-clear signal was given, the children began to sing, in Arabic and in Hebrew.
